

Guardian Flight, which operated the medical airplane that went missing in Alaska, has released the names of those onboard. # The pilot is 63-year-old Patrick Coyle, the flight nurse is 30-year-old Stacie Rae Morse, and the flight paramedic is 43-year-old Margaret Langston Allen. The company statement says all are based in Juneau. # Guardian Flight Randy Lyman says the company is focusing on the crewmembers' families during this difficult time. # The Coast Guard says the twin-engine King Air 200 took off from Anchorage on Tuesday and was expected to land in Kake but never arrived. A Guard spokeswoman says airplane debris was found Wednesday but the search continues because searchers could not immediately confirm the debris found Wednesday is that of the missing plane. # # 4:45 p.m. # The Coast Guard in Alaska says airplane debris has been found during a search for a medical airplane that went missing with three people aboard. # Chief Petty Officer Charly Hengen says searchers could not immediately confirm the debris found Wednesday is of the missing King Air 200 plane operated by Guardian Flight. The debris was found about 22 miles west of the southeast Alaska village of Kake. # The Coast Guard says the twin-engine plane took off from Anchorage on Tuesday and was expected to land in Kake at 6:19 p.m. but never arrived. # Hengen says the search continues for the missing plane, despite the discovery of debris. # # 11:50 a.m. # Federal accident investigators are reviewing radar flight information about a medical airplane that went missing with three people aboard who were heading to pick up a patient in an Alaska village. # Clint Johnson,